NOT WHAT IT SEEMS

When Sarah Palin wore a conservative button-down shirt on the campaign trail (left), she says it was just difficult to see her shape. Casual tees are naturally more revealing.

"I DIDN'T GET IMPLANTS!"

Sarah Palin tells In Touch that the plastic surgery rumors are "nonsense"

Bloggers had a field day when Sarah Palin showed up at the Belmont Stakes racetrack in New York on June 5, debuting what seemed to be a lusher shape in an almost-sheer white top. "We can report with confidence that at least two people with experience in having breasts say that Sarah Palin sure looks like she was trotting out some new work at the horse races," posted the gossip blog Wonkette. Meanwhile, a Boston Herald columnist joked, "Hey Sarah Palin, I can see your cleavage from my house!"

Proof is in the picture

Now, after speaking with her, In Touch can reveal that the former vice presidential candidate is, indeed, all-natural. "If these reporters who insist that I had surgery would do just a tiny bit of research and easily Google other casual pictures over the years, they'd see proof that I look the same as I always have," Sarah tells In Touch, adding, "I just usually wear layers or blazers in public."

As the saying goes, a picture is worth a thousand words: Her shape looks no different in a tee in 2007 than it did on June 5 (above). And experts agree. "Sarah's breasts have the same volume and projection now as they did in earlier photos," confirms Dr. Brian S. Glatt of Premier Plastic Surgery Center of New Jersey, adding, "It's just smoke and mirrors, thanks to her wardrobe."

Dr. Brian S. Glatt has not treated Sarah Palin.
